A man was on a bicycle, crossing the border between the U.S. and Mexico. (Let's pretend it was totally okay.) He was carrying a bag. The border patrol asked what was in it, and the man said, "Simply sand." So the border patrol let him pass. The next day, the man came again, on bicycle, in the same direction as he was going the day before. The border patrol commented on his shirt, which was a red color that complimented his skin tone. The man said his thanks, told him that there was sand in the bag, and crossed the border. This happened every day for two weeks. The man bicycled in, and the border patrol asked him what was in the bag.

At the end of the second week, the border patrol was frustrated.

"I'm going to look in there and see for myself." He opened the bag, and, sure enough, just sand.

At the end of the fifth week, the border patrol was outraged.

"Just give it up already. What are you smuggling?"

What was the man smuggling?

Bicycles. Different ones every day.

There is a house. It has a butler, a maid, and a gardener that tend to it while the owner is away. It's one story tall. The butler's hair is dyed green. As a matter of fact, all of the staff's hair, skin, and uniforms are green. In fact, the whole HOUSE is green. The walls, the floor, the ceiling, the plants, the books, the bookshelves, the pages in the books, the ink in the books, the paintings, the chairs, the tables, the bed, the bedsheets, the pillows, the tv, the tv remote, the closet, the windows, the curtains, and the door are all green. What color are the stairs?
